D. F. WRIGHT, M. D., Editor.

The Courier-Journal and Mr.

Tilden. The great influence exerted by the press on political affairs renders it a matter of national interest when an influential journal takes its position in reference to national questions. Hence an error of any magnitude made by such a journal becomes a national misfortune, either by promoting an unwise position for the party represented by the journal in question, or by diminishing the influence of the journal itself. The Louisville Courier-Journal has now for some years been recognized as wielding a political influence in the Southwest second to that of no other paper. That influence has generally, in our opinion, been most salutary as a guide to Democratic opinion within the region named, and it is our earnest desire that it may continue to be exerted. That desire on our part has dictated the expostulapresent article. Ever since the Presidential election of 1876 the Courier-Journal has been the zealous advocate of Mr. Tilden as the Democratic nominee for that of 1880. To the avowal of this preference we have no objection to offer. Political action is the proper result of public opinion, and public opinion is elicited by free discussion, all the parties to which should be as untrammeled as possible; but where the question is as to the candidate to be selected from the leaders of the party, a certain limitation is demanded by the plainest dictates of party expediency, and this requires, if nothing-else, that possible candidates shall not be attacked to forward the interests of the one favored by the journal in tion which will be the subject of the

Our position may be illustrated by an incident of the election of 1876, in reference to which the Journal and ourselves stood together in perfect harmony. Prior to the convention at which Mr. Tilden was nominated, that gentleman was vigorously opposed by two agencieswithin the Democratic party, the Cincinnati Enquirer and the Tammany organization in New York. In pushing this opposition both the journal and organization in question resorted to most culpable means, ondemned at the time by a large including the Courier-Journal and ourselves. They raked up against Mr. Tilden all the items of political doing the work of the Republican it from the odium of originating paper. such dirty slanders.
